2012
COLLECTION

2012 sees CollectA enter its sixth year of existence in producing models of prehistoric fauna and flora with the introduction of two new series and the creative expansion of a third. In an attempt to likewise educate and to provide the greatest amount of creative play both the new series will, it is hoped, be well received.

As a child growing up in the 1950s and early 1960s I always found it annoying that no manufacturer ever produced anything for my toy carnivorous dinosaurs to eat. Herbivorous dinosaurs could be catered for by the bushes and trees produced for modern zoo and farm animals, but meat eaters were apparently not allowed food. This situation has continued until now for, as a result of this omission, CollectA is the first company to introduce an innovative new series entitled Dinosaur Prey to complement its carnivorous dinosaurs and to add a new educational element to building a prehistoric diorama or landscape. Dinosaur Prey will include dead animals from different geological eras and will feature evidence that we can ascertain from the fossil record of wounds that might have been inflicted on them by carnivores during conflicts. Allied to this new series is the introduction of a new standard size Tyrannosaurus Rex that comes complete with its prey, a dead Struthiomimus.

A problem with producing scale models of dinosaurs are the many important but small creatures that were a prominent part of any prehistoric landscape but that have been too small to realistically be commercially produced for sale in retail outlets as individual figures. It has been my wish for some time to solve this problem and with this in mind in 2012 I have designed and CollectA starts a second innovative new series entitled Dinosaur Families featuring family or clan groups of small dinosaurs in scale with the larger animals in the range. I have chosen Hypsilophodonts, one of my favorite "British" dinosaurs to commence the series and, by request, the newly discovered ceratopsian Koreaceratops. The figures are presented in family groups on landscaped bases also ornamented with an example of prehistoric flora.

This year CollectA is also pleased to expand its innovative and groundbreaking collection of Prehistoric Flora that it first introduced in 2009. As with the original two examples, these new additions are intended to add yet another element of educational interest and enjoyment in studying and playing with dinosaurs and to complement the animals in both the standard and deluxe ranges and help in the building of prehistoric dioramas. As with the earlier examples they are also intended to provide "food" for the herbivores! The plants are equipped with bases that may be joined to those of the Dinosaur Families to form landscaped scenes.

The 2012 standard dinosaur range includes the recently discovered ceratopsian dinosaurs Uroceratops and Kosmoceratops together with the marine reptile Daicbarhynchops and the South American giants Argentinosaurus and Mapusaurus. In the Deluxe 1:40 range I am pleased to present updated and considerably improved models of Neovenator and Amargosaurus, together with my idea of the enormous but little known Deinoceratops. Joining the current Deluxe 1:15 Tyrannosaurus is a new and huge Triceratops that we hope is our most accurate model of the species to date. In the Prehistoric Animals range we introduce a model of the North American Megaceratops, also known as Brontotherium, that we hope will find favour.

Wishing you all a happy and educational year of play and collecting.

Each prehistoric sculpture has been approved by Anthony Beeson, a well respected expert in palaeoimagery who is also an art librarian, archaeologist and collector, based in the City of Bristol, England
